Did you read the _____ yesterday? There was a _____ about a little girl who died because her mum didn't give her any food. A week ago, there were three _____ items on TV about parents who hurt their children and last month social workers gave _____ in court about a man who had sexually _____ his two teenage daughters. We spoke about family problems with David Webb. David works for Liverpool Council's Children's Services Department. He is a child _____ worker. "Parents are not always loving and _____," David says, "and neglect and child abuse are not new. We hear more today, because neighbours, _____ and friends tell the police and the police inform us about these _____. Some cases make the news headlines but we know that a lot more children suffer _____ the ones who my colleagues and I meet." David's team deals with physical abuse, sexual abuse, home _____ children and the children of drug _____ and alcoholics. The team works with the _____ family if possible, but the child protection workers _____ on what is good for the child. David sees children of all ages, from babies to _____. A lot of the older children have run _____ from home because of abuse.

"There are a number of _____ for abuse," David tells us. "Poor education, money problems, poor _____ conditions. Imagine being at home all day with a small child in a tiny _____ and no money to go _____. Sometimes parents are too young to know how to look _____ children. A lot of the parents are almost children themselves."

When you read about these cases in the newspapers you see that abuse isn't only a problem _____ poor families or uneducated people. It can happen in all _____ of families. "Every family can be a problem family," David says. "A lot of the time we need to help the _____ before we can help their children. Sometimes the parents have problems because nobody looked after them _____ when they were children. You can often see a _____ going through the generations. All of the cases I deal with are very sad and sometimes the cases are so shocking that I think about giving _____ the work. But yesterday I sorted out another case and stopped another child's suffering. That's when I know that all the stress is _____ it."
